This somission compiled with the manifest suspiciousness of the appearances, fully justified the fort in its first fire, and if it had not gone further, I do not believe any apology would nave been easily accorded, as it could not have been justly claimed. But the continuance of the fire after the signal of acknowledgment coupled with the subsequent assurances and proof of the bena fide purpose of fetching a sweep to get round, placed the Portuguese Government in a position in which apology could not have been refused. Personally (though new a political adversary) I wish my old schoolfellow, Capt.
